

Impending collapse or sustainable transformation? The role of the G7 in solving global debt crises

Thursday | May 19, 2022 | 6-8 pm CEST

Engagement Global, Friedrich-Ebert-Allee 40, 53113 Bonn, Germany and virtually via Zoom

The multiple crises of climate change, pandemic and global recession have led to the debt situation of many countries in the Global South assuming critical dimensions today. Three times as many countries as before the Corona pandemic are in a particularly critical debt situation (erlassjahr.de and MISEREOR: Global Sovereign Debt Monitor 2022). Many countries are already able to service their debt only by incurring new debt and cutting public spending for social security as well as other sustainable investments including sustainable infrastructure.

The fiscal situation of countries in the Global South will be further exacerbated by the global economic impact of the war in Ukraine, including higher interest rates, food and energy prices. The debt situation thus threatens not only the immediate recovery from the pandemic, but also the socially just ecological transformation. But measures taken by the G20 so far have failed to bring about any substantial debt restructuring and / or debt relief, and no further progress is in sight. The World Bank recently warned of a humanitarian catastrophe in the Global South if unsustainable debt is not reduced quickly and fairly.

The G7 finance ministers will meet from May 18 to 20. As a community of values, the G7 states claim a special responsibility for shaping a future of "prosperity, stability and solidarity". During the German G7 presidency, "the major economic and financial policy issues of the coming years" are to be advanced. This also includes achieving sustainable solutions for critically indebted countries.

In what ways have the measures taken so far contributed to avoiding and solving the debt crisis in the Global South? What should the "strengthened implementation of the international debt strategy" envisaged by the G7 look like in concrete terms in order to facilitate sustainable solutions? What short- and long-term adjustments to the international debt architecture are needed? And what role for the G7 vis-à-vis the G20 and the UN?
